A story about mice, rice and being nice

Every day was the same for Steven Thistle. He got dressed at seven, left the house at half past, cycled to his office in the city centre and sat at his desk till precisely six o'clock. As the sales assistant at Whistle stop Cellphones, he did sums superbly. Tidiness was satisfying—he liked everything to be just so. His boss, Mr Sissons, was a disagreeable, cheerless person, always hassling him for answers in a loud voice. "Mr Thistle, can you process the most recent reports? And speedily!" "Yes, sir...At once, sir," Steven would say seriously. The best part of the day was lunch, which consisted of a nice sandwich, some juice and something sweet, such as chocolates, sultanas, or his special snack: salt and vinegar rice cakes. Several people close by made faces at the smell of them, which certainly was strong and somewhat stinky, like gas. But he was used to their silly gossiping. One day, he had just settled at his desk when something scampered across the surface and disappeared down the side. A mouse! It must have found a small slice of cheese ...No, a rice cake was missing!
